Discussion Starter • #1 • February 17, 2017 Reconstructed carb on my 2004 kodiak. Put it back on the wheeler and I started it. I need to tune both inactive turns which is easy using the adjustment screw that impes on the accelerator on the side of the carbore, and adjust the mixing screw on the front of the carbo. I'm leaving for a trip this afternoon. Is there a way to adjust the mixing screw without having to remove the carborate from the wheeler? You'd think if they wanted to fix it, they wouldn't hide the vine in such a tight spot. . Discussion Starter • #2 • February 17, 2017 Or can anyone comment, is that the only screw I have to fiddle with for adjustment? All the other jets inside the carbs are sitting all the way through. I'm bringing my toolbox with but I wonder if I need to completely break down the carb or just remove it and adjust that outer screw to the front bottom. . Or can anyone comment, is that the only screw I have to fiddle with for adjustment? All the other jets inside the carbs are sitting all the way through. I'm bringing my toolbox with but I wonder if I need to completely break down the carb or just remove it and adjust that outer screw to the front bottom. I'm not sure if you fixed this or not, but you're right, it's the only adjustment screw. I'm going to put it on the quad bike. After reconstructing the carbtor, I set the screw (tighten it all the way, but not too narrow, and distort 2 complete rotations as the baseline) and reinstall. I start the quad bike and heat it. Then raise the inactivity to hear any changes in inactivity while making any adjustments. A lot of information about this on Google and YouTube, but it seems like you may know what you're doing. I bought this tool and it worked very well for multiple reasons: 1 - It is the only tool I found that would fit into the narrow space. Space becomes more only when you turn back the adjustment screw! 2 - It has a positive feedback click, so you know when you shot it and you can keep counting. Mine is 6 clicks for 1 full revolution, so I always where the screw adjustment is located. 3 - The small red plastic wheel works well for use with a finger. I use tight mechanical gloves to prevent burns... it usually takes 5-10 minutes to get it right. I rebuilt carb on my 2004 kodiak. Put it back on the wheeler and I started it. I'm not sure I look at the tool the right way or not, but I don't think there's enough room for it. There's less than an inch of space before you even start supporting that screw! Sent by my SM-G900W8 using Tapatak . I just looked at my Kodiak 400 and you're right. There is not so much space to use the flexible shaft screw driver. My grizzlies 600 and 660 have more space between the bottom of the carb and the top of the plinth. I have a Chinese carb on my Kodiak and it doesn't have a tampering cap on the inactive mix screw. I didn't have to make any adjustments as it is inactive and works great. .
